White Trail Description

This scenic route is perfect for both walkers and cyclists, following well-maintained forest roads almost throughout, with one uneven, muddy but short section along a minor track.

Leaving the war memorial car park head up the trail. At the crossing, follow way marker 1 with the white arrow and turn right onto the old railway line and underneath an old railway bridge.

The Killin railway line was opened in 1885 and the trains brought tourists into Killin and down to the shore of Loch Tay – where they could hop onto a steam ship and get a tour of Loch Tay. The line was discontinued in 1965 and today the former railway-system is used as a hiking and cycling path.

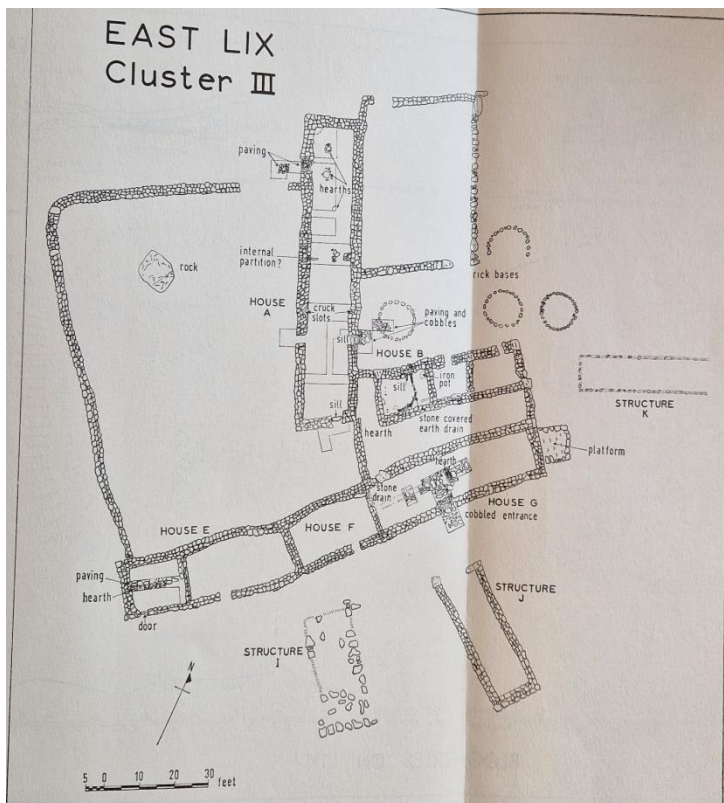

The path will very gently incline for just over 2 km, leading through a mix of conifer- and mixed woodland. Have a good look around as this is a great spot to see red squirrels, jays and a variety of other birds, weasel and deer.

After about 1km you will pass Acharn Farm to your right, a collection of old and new cottages with a tennis court to your right. Enjoy the view of one of their ponds with the hills in the backdrop.

Shortly after you will go over a rather inconspicuous bridge with some metal rails. Climbing down a short, muddy and steep path to the left after the bridge will lead you down to the burn and will reward you with an unusual sight: squeezed between the tunnel for the burn and the old railway line is another tunnel for pedestrians. During the time, when the railway was still active, this tunnel was used to move sheep and cattle from one field to the other without having to cross the rails.

Follow the old railway line until you come to a 4-way crossing with way marker 2, ignoring a newer forestry path turning off to the left earlier. Turn left onto an equally wide path which will now get steeper as it is part of a forestry road.

After about 200m – and if you are feeling adventurous- look to your right where there is a wider gap between the line of planted conifer trees and a fainted path. This will lead you to a clearing with the ruins of an accumulation of crofts, barns and byres called “East Lix”. First registered in 1573, this was the home to flax weavers and sheep farmers until the late 19th century.

If you have chosen to do the wee detour, go back onto the forestry road and follow it for another 500m when you reach a junction at way marker 3. Turn right towards Glen Ogle. The windy road will once again lead through conifer woodland with a steady incline before steepening and becoming a tarmac path.

Follow for about 2km when, shortly before a gate, another forestry road turns off to the left (way marker 5). Take the left turn and follow the rather dull forestry road steadily uphill for about 3.5 km and until you reach a T-Crossing. Turn right here (way marker 6) for a short but steep section uphill. If your legs are up for it, you can choose to detour to a nice viewpoint along the climb: about 100 metres passed waypoint 6 an unmarked road goes off to the right and leads up for a few hundred metres to a great viewpoint looking over the Tarmachan Ridge, Ben Lawers and Loch Tay and is well worth a visit.

The steep walk ends as the road makes a left bend over a little bridge (way marker 8) while ignoring the smaller path going straight ahead. The forestry road now levels out and the walk goes along a conifer woodland to your left and some more interesting wild heathery moorland hills to your right. Keep an eye out for hares, deer, stags and a diversity of birds (of prey) here.

Shortly after passing a large pipe to your right, which is part of a local hydro scheme built in the 1950s and 1960s and feeds water into a nearby reservoir, the conifers fade away, making space for a fantastic panoramic view point along a layby. On a clear day you can see Stob Binnein & Ben More (Crianlarich) to the West, along Glen Dochart and into Glen Lochay and further to the Tarmachan- and Ben Lawers Hills to the East.

Follow the road through a gate (keep dogs on a lead here as there are sheep grazing along this section) and go downhill to reach a mast. Just a bit further, the road ends in a T-crossing. Turn left onto the tarmac road and further downhill and go through the forest gate (way marker 9).

Follow the tarmac road downhill until a forestry road goes off to the right (way marker 10). Here you have the option to follow the tarmac road all the way down to meet the South Loch Tay Road as a short-cut, or otherwise, take the grassy track to the right until it joins the Cuildochart forestry track. This section is gently descending. After about 1 km there are some views onto the dam of Lochan Breachlaich to your right.

Follow the track until you reach way marker 11 and keep left descending more steeply to way marker 12.

Turn right through the gate and down until, after about 80m, you reach the tarmacked South Loch Tay Road.

Go left, but only for approximately 300m, after which a track splits off to the right (waypoint 14). This track is rough and bumpy and care should be taken. A large house will appear to the right with Loch Tay behind it. These were the former stables of Auchmore House, owned by the Marquess of Breadalbane and demolished in the 1960s. You will also pass a large Sequoia tree, standing on the right of the path. This tree was planted by Queen Victoria herself in 1842, when visiting Auchmore House during her honeymoon.

The uneven road now ends in a slightly better road (way marker 15).

Go straight over the small bridge. Follow the road for about 1 km and past the White House to your left and views of Kinnell Farm in the distance to your right. This was the original seat of the Clan of the MacNabs from the late 17th century on.

Shortly after continue straight on.

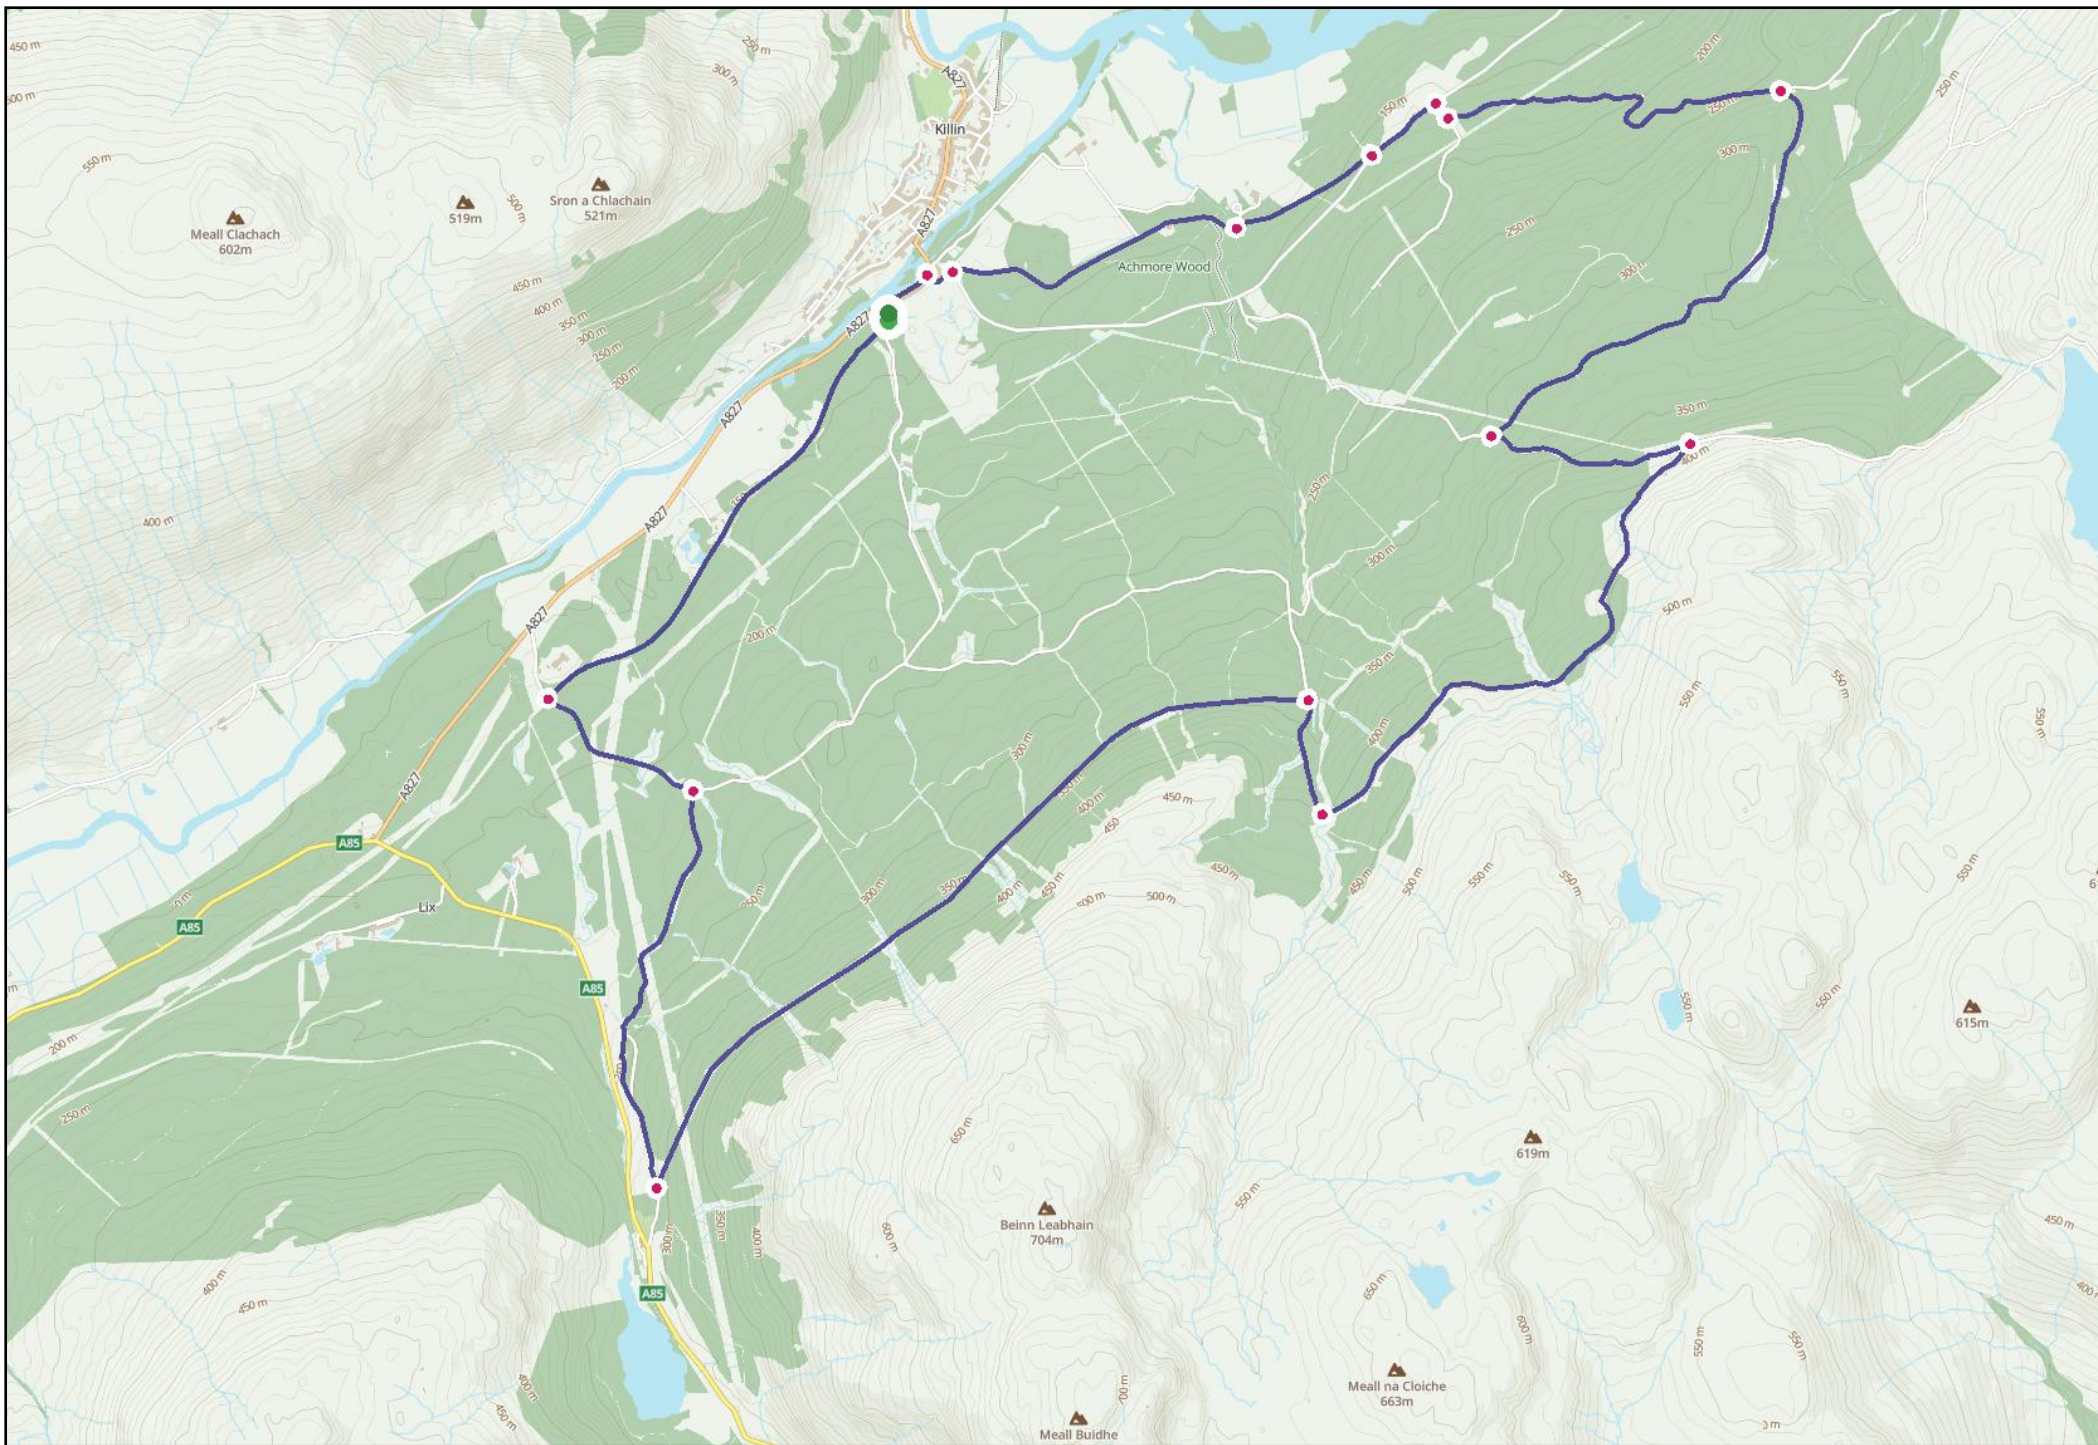

On the right-hand side on the lower field, you can spot the Kinnell Stone Circle. Keep on the track until it re-joins the South Loch Tay Road. Go straight ahead onto the South Loch Tay Road (way marker 16), which short after makes a sharp right bend, ending in a T-crossing with the Main Street (Gray Street) and views of the Falls of Dochart.

To your right is the Falls of Dochart Inn, where you might wish to have a well-deserved refreshment before heading left along the pavement and back to the war memorial car park and the finish of the loop.

What an accomplishment conquering about 19 km!
